PREFACE

THE Twentieth Century and the Twentieth Century Dictionary b[illegible] together, and they ran together through half the century's cour[illegible] The work of the editor, Mr. Thomas Davidson, was continued by various members of the editorial staff until it was found that ordinary revision no longer sufficed. A dictionary with a bulky supplement is a waste of time and a trier of temper. A thorough overhaul was therefore made. Every word already admitted, every definition and etymology, was subjected to scrutiny. New words and phrases—some never before given in a general dictionary, some not until now appearing in a dictionary at all—were collected from many sources. These were very numerous, owing to developments of science, social changes, new habits of life and recreation, and new habits of language resulting from these—notably furthered by the virtual drying up of the Atlantic as a speech barrier. A very few words have been discarded altogether. These belong chiefly to two classes—ghost words, which come by copying or reading amiss, and dictionary words that somebody with a Greek or Latin Dictionary has concocted but nobody so far as can be discovered has ever used.

As before, the aim has been to include all words in general use in literary and conversational English, and all words used in Shakespeare and the Authorised Version of the Bible, in the poems (and many of those in the prose writings) of Spenser and Milton, and in the novels of Walter Scott. It should be understood that to label a word Milt. does not mean that nobody but Milton has used it. This is not a dictionary of Scots, but many words of Burns, Ramsay, Fergusson, Galt, and Barrie will be found in it, with many that are still in familiar colloquial use in Scotland. These are marked Scot., but in most cases they are current on both sides of the Border. Likewise we hope no Canadian will take it as a slight when he finds his words marked U.S. Indeed such has been the diffusion that many in Britain may object to such labelling; but let them take it as historically true. Dialect words that have made good their footing in literature have been included, with such slang words as seem likely to maintain themselves as well as some dead slang that may puzzle readers, say, of Dicken[illegible]

The original edition acknowledged special indebtedness to two American Dictionaries, the Century and the Standard. The revise[illegible] Webster has further strengthened our American side. The Oxford Dictionary, which of course must be the foundation of all Engl[illegible] dictionaries, had been used as far as it went, as had Wright's Dialect Dictionary. The Oxford was completed in 1933, Wright in 1905. Two great Scottish dictionaries now in progress have been much used and would have been more used had their publication kept pace with the work—Sir William Craigie's Dictionary of the Older Scottish Tongue and the Scottish National Dictionary of Mr. Grant and his successors. For Latin etymologies we have been guided chiefly by Ernout and Meillet's Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue latine, for Greek by Boisacq's Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue grecque and the new Liddell and Scott. For old French we have Godefroy's Dictionnaire de l'ancienne langue française. Some definitions have been adopted or adapted from our own Technical Dictionary.

A great part of the construction of this dictionary has been in the hands of Miss A. M. Macdonald. The whole owes much to the vigilance of Mr. J. Liddell Geddie who read a large part of the proofs, and several other members of the staff have made useful contributions. Dr. Angus Macdonald has helped with the etymologies. Finally, scores of users of the dictionary have sent in single words and lists of words. We have not accepted all their suggestions. One was disappointed not to find myristicivorous, feeding upon nutmegs, a word to which we grant this place on the doorstep but still deny admission to the dictionary. To these correspondents we owe much, and we tender our thanks, especially to those who first make sure that their words are not already in.

WILLIAM GEDDIE.
